An aid, not an answer

This is an approximate description of the village which is obvious at first glance – it dœs not reveal all of the secrets of Saltmere.

Saltmere is a fishing village of forty-odd families, built on stilts above the mudflats where the river meets the sea. Its people are friendly enough to strangers who pay in coin, and wary of anyone who asks about the old temple.

1: The Drowned Bell

The village's only tavern stands at the end of the longest jetty. Its keeper, Morwen Tull, serves fish stew and weak ale, and knows everyone's business.

Morwen is happy to talk about the temple, if the party buys a round.

2: The Dock

A grandiose name for the portion of the jetty facing out to sea, it is here that the old sea dogs gather before heading off to the pub for the evening, and trade the latest catch amongst themselves.

3: The Chapel

A small chapel dedicated to the god Knonald Duth, run by the local priest, who is found within the The Drowned Bell (1) whenever not giving sermons.

4: The Sunken Temple

A forbidden temple which has fallen into disrepair and slipped beneath the waves. The townsfolk avoid it.
